1 Introduction

Bogotá, officially named Bogotá, Capital District (in Spanish: Bogotá, Distrito Capital), is the capital and largest city of Colombia. It also serves as the capital of the department of Cundinamarca, though it is not an integral part of it. Located in the center of Colombia, on the Cundiboyacense high plateau, a high plain of the Eastern Cordillera of the Andes, Bogotá is a vibrant and multicultural metropolis, the economic, cultural, and political crossroads of the country. With an estimated population of over 8 million inhabitants within the city limits and over 11 million in its metropolitan area, it is one of the largest cities in Latin America.

Bogotá's altitude is approximately 2,640 meters above sea level, which gives it a temperate mountain climate, characterized by relatively constant temperatures throughout the year. The average annual temperature is around 14.5 °C, with daily variations being more pronounced than seasonal variations. The city experiences two dry seasons (December-February and July-August) and two wet seasons (March-May and September-November). Rainfall is frequent, often in the form of intense showers.

Bogotá's position on the high plateau has historically favored its development. Surrounded by imposing mountains, including Monserrate and Guadalupe which overlook the city, it offers spectacular landscapes. The Bogotá River flows through the region and contributes to its agricultural richness, although it also faces significant environmental challenges.

3 History

Bogotá was founded on August 6, 1538, by the Spanish conquistador Gonzalo Jiménez de Quesada, who named it Santa Fe. The city quickly became an important administrative center under Spanish rule, becoming the seat of the Viceroyalty of New Granada in 1717.
